

Child Development Center in Navi Mumbai: Why a Multidisciplinary Approach Works

Children with developmental needs rarely present with a single, neatly isolated difficulty. A child who struggles with speech often has sensory processing challenges running alongside. A child diagnosed with autism may need occupational therapy, behavioural support, and academic accommodation all at once. Addressing these needs through separate providers — one clinic for speech, another for behaviour, a school programme for learning support — creates gaps, inconsistencies, and a burden on families that fragments rather than helps.

The Role of the Shadow Teacher

A Shadow Teacher works alongside a child within the school setting — providing one-on-one support during the school day to help the child access the curriculum, manage the social environment, and build independence over time. For children with autism, ADHD, or significant learning differences, a well-trained shadow teacher bridges the gap between therapy gains in the clinical setting and actual function in the classroom.

Aakaar trains and deploys shadow teachers as part of their inclusion support services — working with schools and families together rather than placing a child in a school environment without adequate in-class support.

Early Childhood Development support through the centre's Early Intervention Programme runs as a structured preschool environment for children with special needs aged 2 to 6, combining therapy with the social and academic experiences of a group setting.
